Gold rallied from an eight-month low, snapping three days of losses, on speculation that reduced prices may spur purchases before the Federal Reserve begins a two-day policy meeting.

News Summary

The last holdout to the U.S.dollar's world-beating rally is crumbling, and the derivatives market signals that there's no relief on the way anytime soon.

Australia's dollar slid below 90 U.S. cents today for the first time since March as evidence of a slowdown in China and a weak domestic economy boosts the chances that the South Pacific nation's policy makers will hold interest rates at a record low, just as the U.S. Federal Reserve moves closer to raising borrowing costs. While the Aussie is the only Group-of-10 currency to advance against the greenback this year, its gain has eroded to 0.8 percent from 6.5 percent at the start of July.anyway, so this is more of a reality check.

Until recent weeks, Australia's interest rates, which are the highest in the developed world after New Zealand, had allowed its currency to resist a rally in the dollar that pushed the euro and pound to their worst back-to-back monthly losses since early 2013.
